Title: Pushkin’s presence in Nabokov’s unfinished novel Solus Rex
Author: Irena Ronen, Independent Scholar

My purpose is to demonstrate the impact and the artistic transformation of Pushkin’s themes and motifs in a chapter from the unfinished novel Solus Rex, later published separately under the title “Ultima Thule.” These Pushkinian allusions support the connection detected by Dolinin (2004, 278-293) between Solus Rex and the draft sequel to The Gift published by Grayson (1994, 21-67).

Pushkin’s themes sometimes enter Nabokov’s text through intermediary sources. The inception and the conclusion of “Ultima Thule”, addressed to the lost beloved, resemble a poem in prose: “esli posle tvoci smerti ia i mir eshche sushchestvuem, to lish’ blagodaria tomu, chto ty mir i menia vspominaesh’ […] Slyshish’ li menia?” (Nabokov 5, 2000, 113-114). There is a perceptible echo here of Tiutchev’s poem commemorating the death of Denis’eva (“Vot tot mir, gde zhili my s toboiu. / Angel moi, ty vidish’ li menia?”), itself influenced by Pushkin’s late lyric poetry and by Rusalka (Berkovskii 1987, 42).

Pushkin’s approach is noticeable in Nabokov’s treatment of the pervasive theme of the death of a loved one and the attempted communication with her in “Ultima Thule” as well as in The Gift. These themes, a salient component of Nabokov’s English novels, had already been present in “The Return of Chorb,” which in several respects had prefigured “Ultima Thule” and some episodes of the sequel to The Gift, as well as manifested a creative debt to Pushkin, especially to Rusalka and Feast during the Plague.
